New York, NY -- (ReleaseWire) -- 01/16/2018 -- Chronic prostatitis (CP) is difficult to cure and easy to recur, which brings agonies and tortures to the patients. Plenty of researches have been done to find the reasons.

A latest case report by Luisetto M shows that the responsible factors of recurrent chronic prostatitis can be: sensing-activated biofilms, urinary reflux, incomplete pathogen eradication etc. Two causes need to be emphasized. First, as we know, prostate is covered with a thick biofilm, which is responsible for the difficulties in diagnostic methods and in therapy. Common treatments can't reach the disease sources because of this obstruction. Second, 90% of the chronic prostatitis is nonbacterial, so antibiotics can't work effectively. What's worse, the misuse and overuse of antibiotics can lead to many side effects like damages on liver and kidney, resulting in drug resistance and tolerance, which increase the difficulty of treatment.

Another case-crossover study in Mapp Research Network shows that two factors, recent sexual activity and urinary tract infection overlap with flare triggers of recurrent chronic prostatitis. Certain dietary factors, abdominal muscle exercises, and vaginal infection had additional positive associations with flare onset in part of the case, but other factors like stress is irrelevant.
